

AFTER THE FIRE

A group of seven University of Adelaide students recently visited the Larapinta Trail in the Northern Territory to help repair damage caused by recent bushfires. The students are studying business, economics and law – but for eight days they had a radical change of scene, camping out in the centre of Australia. The trek is a new partnership between the university's Professions Student Ambassador Program, Trek Larapinta and the NT Parks and Wildlife Commission. Student experience co-ordinator Kim Burdett says the program opened her eyes to the array of opportunities and contributions people can make in the region. "It's important for the youth of today, our future leaders, to see and experience different aspects of our country and community; to have an impact and to make a difference is incredibly fulfilling." The university is planning multiple trips in 2013.
